Developments in Aboriginal Law

Indigenous governments hold inherent jurisdiction to make laws for their own people and lands in accordance with their own legal orders, in addition to jurisdiction recognized under or delegated under Canadian law. Canadian courts, operating under the Canadian legal framework, are being asked to judicially review decisions made by Indigenous governments pursuant to and in alignment with Indigenous legal orders.

This session will examine how Canadian courts are treating the judicial review of decisions made under Indigenous laws – what Canadian courts have said so far about their jurisdiction to review these decisions, how the Vavilov framework and procedural fairness review are being applied in this context, and the practical issues that are arising on the ground.

Krista Nerland
